THIS CRIMINAL GOVERNMENT

Blair's attack on Iraq is an international outrage, has endangered many innocent lives and serves no British interest whatever. Is the Israeli lobby behind it?

This criminal Government

The air attack launched against Iraq by British and American forces last month was a criminal act – by any criteria that might be applied. It was a crime against the people of Iraq. It was a crime against international law – if you judge such a concept important (and this Government is always saying that it does). Most important of all, it was a crime against Britain. Iraq does not threaten any genuine British interest, and we should only attack those nations that threaten our interests. In addition, the attack positively harmed Britain's interests because of the fresh wave of hatred it has provoked throughout the Middle East against this country – and quite deservedly so.

It might also be said that, in addition to hatred, Britain will have earned itself the further contempt of the Arab World because, as every informed person in that world will know, this was just another demonstration of the fact that Britain has no real foreign policy of its own but a policy merely of doing whatever in the world the Americans tell it to do (no-one can possibly take seriously the news story that it was on British initiative that the raid was carried out; things simply do not happen that way in modern 'Anglo-American' relations).

The Blair Government has attempted to justify the raid by saying that it was to defend our aircraft from being shot down in the 'no-fly zones' above Iraq. But the fact is that not a single British (or American) plane has been touched over the no-fly zones in the past ten years – and all this is quite separate from the question of what those planes should be doing flying over Iraq anyway!

Possibly, in the next few weeks some more evidence may come to light as to the real reasons for the latest attack, but of one thing we can be sure: a government that quite pathetically fails to stand up for any real British interest when it is threatened (as in Northern Ireland or in our fishing waters, for instance) has not ordered this particular operation out of patriotic duty.

Much more likely is it that the operation is connected with the Government's total commitment to assist what it perceives as the interests of Israel in the region. Saddam Hussein's Iraq is seen as the big, bad bogey for Israel. That is the main reason for the constant campaign against Saddam in the 'British' media.

This aside, the attack on Iraq may have some useful spin-off as a diversion from other matters as a general election in Britain looms near. Operations of war, though ordinarily loathsome to Labour politicians, are often welcome from this standpoint.

Peter the fall guy?

This magazine is not likely to be accused of harbouring a bias in favour of Peter Mandelson.

But there is something stomach-wrenching about the way in which Mandelson is currently being treated by the New Labour gang as a convenient bucket into which to tip its mounting pile of rotten garbage. The recent scandal in which the former Ulster Secretary was found to have schemed to get British passports for the Indian Hinduja brothers in exchange for donations to the Labour Party lifted the lid off a web of sleaze and corruption that clearly extends far beyond the so-called 'Prince of Darkness'.

It has now become commonplace to say of this: "So what? They're all at it!" or "Things have been worse" or "They're worse on the Continent." In other words, many wrongs make a right! The truth is that the British public and its counterparts all over the so-called 'free world' have become pretty well conditioned to accept a standard of morality in politics that would not be tolerated for two minutes in most other institutions. Andrew Alexander had it well summed up when commenting in the Daily Mail on the 2nd February:-

"The commonplace dishonesty in politics may explain, but does not excuse, glaring examples, especially when they land colleagues in trouble or promote suspicions that rather more than a check on the address of the Passport Office was involved in the famous 'phone call to the Home Office.

"It was, in fact, the constant dishonesty of politicians which drove me to abandon daily reporting of parliament some 16 years ago...

"Like so many moral failings, the dishonesty of politicians can start in quite a small way. A newly arrived MP finds himself expected above all to 'attack' the other side. He may well have already been campaigning on the grounds that his local opponent is a menace to society and his party to civilisation.

"In which case he is happy to keep it up. Less combative arrivals are easily sucked in. Only a few remain aloof.

"MPs may come into politics with a real enthusiasm about individual issues. But the chief prize for the great majority is not particular reforms but their party getting – and keeping – power."

Which seems to indicate that as long as the present political system endures – a system which for ever requires the politicians of one party to keep their noses in front of those of the others – we can expect little change. The reward for honesty and decency in a politician is for him and his party to be losers in the party game.

So it really is difficult to come down too hard on the Mandelsons of this world. They are simply the creatures of the system with which we are stuck – a system which makes dishonesty an essential ingredient of political survival, just as it makes trickery and wheeler-dealing of the kind involving the Hinduja's passports the everyday norm.

PC chickens come home to roost

It was bound to happen, but everyone was surprised at how quickly it happened. Hardly was the ink dry on the legislation document affirming 'sex-equality' within the armed forces and the incorporation of women into army fighting units than the news broke that a male and a female soldier had gone AWOL in an elopement from their unit in Cyprus.

known. Speaking for ourselves, we would not advise anyone to hold their breath over the matter.

We have said it before. We can only hope and pray that, with the present lunatics in charge of British defence policy, this country does not find itself in a serious war with a powerful and dangerous enemy. If it does, God help us all!

But you haven't heard everything yet. The latest is that, in compliance with the laws (from Europe) forbidding sex-discrimination, we are going to have to have women in the SAS! Four have been chosen to go on a special training and selection scheme in Devon, but there is one rule that must be observed: the NCOs in charge have been told

Nonsense on steel

Simon Heffer of the Daily Mail is one of those journalists who flatter to deceive. One day they are saying things eminently sound, and the next day they are talking piffle. When Heffer is not engaging in his tirades of hatred against the Scots (which he would never dare to do against coloured immigrants) he does quite often hit the nail on the head. Last month, however, he was back to one of his silly moods again. How about this:-

"There has been a collective outburst of insanity over this week's steel closures. Why does the Prime Minister want to talk to Corus's executives? Is he going to re-nationalise the industry? Why does he think their commercial plans are any of his business? And why did Nigel Evans, the idiot who spoke on the closures for the Tory Party in the Commons on Wednesday, ask what the Government was going to do? Have the Tories also abandoned their belief in private enterprise?"

"I'm genuinely sorry for the steelworkers who will lose their jobs but – providing there's a free market – they'll end up like the thousands of miners who were made redundant in the Eighties and Nineties – and go on to get a better job elsewhere."

The fact is that the recent closures announced by Corus will, if they go ahead, constitute an important nail in the coffin of the British steel industry. We could end up by having no steel-making capacity in this country at all. Taking into account the number of other manufactured products in which steel is a major ingredient – motors, ships, aircraft, railway stock, industrial machinery, defence hardware and so many others – this could be catastrophic. Yet to express concern about a development likely to lead to it is, apparently, an "outburst of insanity." On just what planet do people like Heffer live? And does a belief in 'private enterprise' require that this Government – or any government – should not regard the threatened extinction of such a vital industry as steel as indicative of a grave national crisis for which it should be responsible?

This is not to say that the Prime Minister's talks with the Corus company are likely to lead to any action which would get to the heart of the problem; such talks these days are just ritual demonstrations for the voters' benefit. It is only to say that this is a matter which the Government should properly be treating as an absolute national emergency.

As for saying that it's OK if thousands of steelworkers lose their jobs – they can get employment elsewhere, that sounds intriguingly like Marie Antoinette calling for the peasants to eat cake.

In Mr. Heffer's world, the commercial plans of a firm like Corus are no business of a prime minister. But if they are not, in heaven's name what is?

The fruits of Tony's military reforms. This cartoon, published in the London Evening Standard on the 2nd February, summed things up perfectly.

Actually, it all happened in July last year but only came to light publicly at the end of January – maybe because it took the Ministry of Defence that long to think of what to say.

The episode was particularly embarrassing to the MoD because the woman, Lance Bombardier Heidi Cochrane, had served as 'cover girl' for the Army's new sex-equality PR operation, being smilingly photographed in full combat gear and with rifle to illustrate the joys of life in Tony Blair's new 'unisex' armed forces. Heidi, who was already married, apparently took off with her lover, Gunner Chris Martin. When the couple were finally traced, they announced that there was no way they were going to be forced to return to duty. This, of course, amounts to an act of desertion, but whether it will ever lead to the two being court-martialled is not so far they must not swear at the trainees, nor indeed use crude language of any kind!

Now to those of us with any experience of the armed forces of old the proposition that there should be a tough and demanding training and selection course in which all swearing is ruled beyond limits is novel, to say the least. But apparently Princess Tony's 'modern' military planners believe with perfect seriousness that this is a realistic option for the armed forces of tomorrow. What next?

It used to be said of the tough and ruthless Russian Field Marshal Georgi Zhukov that he would order the clearing of minefields by getting his most expendable troops to march right over them. Now what a brilliant idea as applied to the boffins of New Labour's defence establishment. A useful role at last!

Tyndall to challenge for BNP leadership

JOHN TYNDALL, editor and publisher of Spearhead, announced at the beginning of March his intention to run for the office of British National Party leader against the present incumbent Nick Griffin later this year.

The BNP Constitution provides for such a challenge in any party year. Mr. Tyndall's official nomination will be submitted in June, and a ballot of all paid-up members must follow within three months from that time.

Mr. Tyndall was BNP leader for more than 17 years between the foundation of the party in 1982 and his displacement by Mr. Griffin following a ballot in 1999. It was during those years that the party grew from relative obscurity to the position of being able to fight every region in England and Scotland in the Euro Election of the latter year.

After he had been defeated by Mr. Griffin in the 1999 membership ballot, Mr. Tyndall declared that he would continue to serve the party loyally and urged all members, regardless of their leadership preferences, to do the same (see Spearhead, October 1999). At the same time he said of Mr. Griffin's election: "... the question of whether the members have taken the right decision will be determined by results." At that time he was of the view that one year would not be time enough for these results to be fairly assessed; between one and two years would be necessary.

In announcing his candidature, Mr. Tyndall said that numerous events of the past few months had combined together for a fair assessment of the new leadership to be made, and that it is now time to let the members of the party decide whether Mr. Griffin should carry on as leader or be replaced.

His decision to stand against Mr. Griffin this year, he said, had been made by him alone, but he had been urged by many members, verbally and in correspondence, to make the challenge.

Mr. Tyndall said that it would have been preferable for such a contest not to be held in a year in which a general election is probable. However, in 2002 there will be some very important local government elections. He did not believe that the present situation in the party allowed for any longer delay.

Mr. Tyndall will be calling to others in the party to agree to a 'pact' whereby internally contentious and controversial issues bearing on the party leadership election will not be aired publicly in the run-up to the general election. This of course would not preclude such issues being dealt with in internal communications and debate.

Mr. Tyndall has also said that it is vital that those members of the party who wish to see him restored to the leadership ensure to renew their memberships this year so as to make them eligible to vote in the coming internal election.

The things they're saying

The truth is that the Government's real attitude towards the asylum issue is much more ambiguous than its record would suggest. Certainly, large numbers of undeserving claimants represent an obvious short-term political and financial problem. But in the longer term, they afford opportunities for Labour. For the salient characteristic of New Labour ideology is its determination to redefine Britain and Britishness – through sweeping constitutional and cultural change. It calculates that the enduring success of this project will depend upon sweeping demographic change as well. If it can ride out the initial storm, its chances of accomplishing this goal are dramatically increased.

The Government has sought to defuse this time-bomb in a characteristically sophisticated Mandelsonian way. First, it has sought, via tough-sounding rhetoric, to appear as though it is 'in touch' with popular instincts and so prevent the Conservatives stealing a march on it. Second, it has sought to 'spin' the "good news story" – as exemplified by the Home Office research released this week, which purports to show that immigrants are net contributors to the Treasury. Finally, the Government has tried to smear anyone who questions its policies as ideological kinsmen of the French extreme rightist, Jean-Marie Le Pen, or Austria's Jörg Haider.

This holding action makes good political sense from the Government's point of view. Always with a weather eye on the United States – where illegal immigrants almost swung the election to Al Gore in Florida – it knows that newly arrived groups are likelier to vote for big-government parties than not. Better still, the new public doctrine of 'anti-racism' forestalls all but the boldest opposition.

The Rory Bremner caricature of Tony Blair being pushed around and told what to think by a contemptuous Alastair Campbell is not a joke but the truth, as anyone who knows both Campbell and Blair is painfully aware.

He (Blair) is pleasant, but deeply unimpressive when you meet him; startlingly ignorant of much of the world...

Read cold, his speeches are strange mountain ranges of tripe, empty of thought and full of Daily Mirror-type slogans...

Academics brought in to brief him on great issues despair of his gnat-like attention span. He glazes over and switches off at public occasions when he is not in the spotlight. When he lies – as he lied repeatedly about fox-hunting – he appears not to be conscious that he has done so. He has found it easy to change his opinions on Europe, CND, privatisation and everything else because he never had any views on these things in the first place.

PETER HITCHENS The Mail on Sunday (11.2.01)

Tony Blair is another nonentity in my opinion. Like Clinton, his icon, everything he says and does is in order to win votes.

Just look at his coteries. Have you ever seen such catamites, such onanists, such smiling wallet-lifters? (The Daily Mail... should be ashamed of itself, superimposing a Napoleonic hat and uniform on Blair; the great Napo created the Napoleonic code and built the Arc de Triomphe, Pont Austerlitz, Pont d'Iena, the cemetery at pere Lachaise and Montmartre, a part of rue de Rivoli, the Vendôme column and the Concorde obelisk. Blair created spin and built the Dome!).

TAKI THEODORACOPOULOS The Spectator (27.1.01)

The job of the armed forces is the defence of the realm. And that sometimes involves killing people. And getting killed.

Soldiers are there to make war, not love. We don't want well-rounded, caring, sharing squaddies. We want fiercely loyal hard-cases who'll do as they're told, run towards the sound of machine gun fire for fun and slit throats as cheerfully as they'd peel an orange.

Meddling politicians do their damndest to impose Islington dinner party moral standards on the services.

But Aldershot barracks is not a student common room. And an aircraft carrier is not the Love Boat.

The armed forces can only operate as a disciplined service. Unquestioning obedience and acceptance of the rules is imperative. The interests of the regiment must come before the individual.

Discipline is being undermined by politicians and judges, who seek to apply their own prejudices and Civvy Street notions of 'human rights' to the fighting services.

RICHARD LITTLEJOHN The Sun (13.2.01)

Tomorrow an official 'National Holocaust Day' will be held for the first time. The 'Holocaust', if anyone should need to be reminded, was not a single great event; it is the term that has been coined to describe inclusively all the events that occurred, in innumerable different times and places, in the course of the Nazis' mass murder of the Jews. Some people wonder why this day should be officially held in Britain, which took no part in those crimes. Others fear it may imply that the Jews were the sole victims of the Nazis in a war that destroyed countless millions of all races.

The BBC is covering the event in a big way, but the Government is taking no chances. Broadcasts will be under the editorial control of the Home Office, which maintains, not very convincingly, that all victims of genocide in modern times – Armenians, Cambodians, Rwandans – will be included in an event intended to emphasise the universal compassion of the Blairite state.

Unfortunately, there is no agreement over what constitutes 'genocide'. Is it distinct from 'ethnic cleansing'? Certainly the victims of either will make no such distinction. Shouldn't Stalin's deliberate starvation of millions in the Ukraine, and the mass slaughter of German civilians, expelled from their ancestral lands by the Red Army and its auxiliaries in 1945, have a place in this catalogue of human wickedness?

PETER SIMPLE Daily Telegraph (26.1.01)

Why was Holocaust Memorial day decreed by the British Government a year ago, almost 55 years after the last inmates left the horrid shell of Auschwitz and Richard Dimbleby reported almost speechless from Belsen? Tony Blair has called it "a day when the country reflects on the terrible and evil deeds in the world," and the Home Office has added with similar banality that "This Government has a clear vision of a multi-cultural Britain – one which values the contribution made by each of our many ethnic, cultural and faith communities." In other words, the Day is a characteristic piece of Blairite demagoguery, characteristic of the Prime Minister's love of soundbite politics – even when the soundbite is as trite as "terrible and evil deeds" – and of his desire to ingratiate himself with whatever audience he happens to be addressing or interest-group he happens to be dealing with. It seemed a painless gesture (this Saturday is not, of course, a public holiday); a piece of feel-good attitudinising which would cost nothing.

Today's Foreign Office is the most craven, supine and incompetent in our island's long history. And the New Labour Government, brimful of former CND members, has fired more shots in anger than any British Government since the end of the Second World War.

GEORGE GALLOWAY The Mail on Sunday (18.2.01)

THERE'S NO IMAGE TO BEAT THE IMAGE OF SUCCESS!

RECENTLY I took part in a political discussion with a group of people all of whom adhered broadly to the nationalist and radical-right consensus but some of whom were not members of the British National Party. One of those present ventured a theory as to the (so far) inadequate number of people joining and voting for the BNP, in particular those from what we might refer to as the 'managerial classes'. This he attributed to the party's faulty presentation of its political aims and its image of being 'too extreme'.

more than Labour – although, 'New' Labour having digested so much of the Tories' spiritual outlook, there is not now a great deal of ideological space between the two.

And it is fair to say that this cynicism is much more deeply entrenched the higher we look in the social, educational and occupational scale. The so-called managerial classes simply do not possess the altruism which fired their grandfathers and great grandfathers who answered Kitchener's call to rally to their country in 1915 and after.

This should not be a cause for despair but it should induce us to adjust our expect-– it is going to handicap us. The man (or woman) who has what it takes to make a reasonable success of his or her life, to build a rewarding and socially prestigious career and/or to marry well and raise a happy family, and who in fact is well on the way to the attainment of such fulfilling achievements, is likely to exercise a great deal of caution about becoming involved in something which is thought, rightly or wrongly, to involve considerable upheaval, a considerable disturbing of the calm of private existence.

This is not to say that such a person is always going to be so utterly self-centred as to decide to do nothing, to let the country go to rot in total disregard for its fate and total preoccupation with private and personal interests.

But it does create the great temptation to seek ways of action and service that can be engaged in comfortably, painlessly and without trouble. Such concerns do not exercise the same restraining influence on those in the population with much less to lose.

JOHN TYNDALL takes issue with the trimmers, the moderators and the yearners for 'respectability'

I disagreed with him, and later, reflecting on the discussion, I felt there might be some usefulness in putting my reasons for this disagreement into an article.

For many years, a debate has raged in nationalist circles on this matter of presentation, 'image' and general political tactics. It was taking place in the 1960s, when I was active as a publicist for the nationalist cause; it will probably be taking place for a long time to come. I have listened to a great many opinions on the subject – in the vast majority of cases coming from well-intentioned people, and often highly intelligent people at that. At the same time, I have tried to penetrate through to, observe and analyse the thoughts in members of the British public (and other publics for that matter) which influence their decisions as to whether to become involved with political parties and, when so, which parties. I have formed a number of conclusions, some of which are heavily at odds with the neat theories fashionable among many patriots.

CYNICAL SOCIETY

The first thing we have to understand in assessing our position as a political movement is that we live, and operate, in a society gravely atomised, fragmented and subject to a deep cynicism with regard to any ideals that are concerned with things higher than individual self-interest. For this we have to thank the Right of conventional politics much more than the Left, Toryism much ations – at least in the short term – of the possibilities of what we can achieve.

Nor should it be taken to indicate that the classes of which we are speaking totally lack any genuine concern over the state of the country, that they are so utterly preoccupied with "looking after number one" that they can spare no thought for Britain's future and have no sincere desire to see things take a change for the better.

It is only that in the crassly materialistic and 'everyone-for-himself' society that Britain has become – a society in which personal ambition has been elevated to the very summit among human qualities, and the visible symbols of personal achievement have been presented as the most worthy human goals – the ideal of public service for the good of one's country takes a lower priority. And where it occurs to people at all, the preferred method is, in 99 cases out of 100, going to be one that involves the minimum personal hassle and risk. The 'safe' way of fighting those evils that are damaging Britain (as long as the illusion can be maintained that there is such a way) is going to be much more attractive than the 'dangerous' way inherent in the life of an active nationalist.

Of course, most of this is the product of a certain perception. The reality is usually different. The perceived 'dangers' of activism in such a party as the BNP simply do not materialise in the way that many imagine them to do, but in those quarters where the perception exists – and for as long as it exists

SYSTEM WEIGHTED

But there is a further consideration. The British political system, as we have often observed in these columns, is heavily weighted against small parties and in favour of mainstream parties. The man or woman who seriously wants to do something about the state of the country, but is deterred by the imagined 'dangers' of participation on what some would call the 'extremes' of politics (i.e. a party like the BNP), has a ready-made excuse to avoid the latter: it offers no immediate prospect of being where the actual power is. No matter how disgusted or disillusioned such a person may be with the parties of the mainstream, in such a party – which to all effective intents and purposes today means the Tory Party – some avenue for action is offered, no matter how far from perfect it may be, while the history of parties belonging to the 'extremes' – parties of open, full-blooded nationalism – suggests a future in which well-intentioned patriots will be condemned to spitting in the wind – excluded completely from the practical political process and, at the same time, denied a proper hearing (however undeservedly) by the mass media.

This is a gloomy picture of the situation which I, for one, have never shared. Why not so I shall in due course explain. Nevertheless it is a picture that appears very real to many who contemplate political action for the betterment of Britain.

Interwoven with this picture is the question of political careers. The man or woman with sound political intentions is likely, logically enough, to find some attraction in a life-time dedicated to politics – free from the irksome chore of having to earn a living by work in the outside world. In this there is nothing dishonourable; when one is able to give 100 per cent of one's attention and energy (outside domestic cares) to political work, one can obviously do a great deal more than if such work is confined to leisure hours. Having myself made the decision many years ago to pursue politics as a full-time occupation, I cannot criticise others who aim for the same thing.

Again, participation in a mainstream party provides an avenue to the achievement of this ambition, while involvement in a party of the 'fringe' offers far less in the way of such opportunities. Only a tiny few of us can pursue the latter type of career – if indeed 'career' is the appropriate word for a life with very little (up till now at least) in the way of financial inducements.

Taking these realities into account, politics in modern Britain provide a classic example of the human tendency to seek to reconcile the course of cowardice with that of practical common sense, to offer a rationale for the avoidance of the real battle for our race and nation by resort to the formula of the 'art of the possible'.

It is in these circumstances that great numbers of people of good political instincts and with the desire to act are seduced into the dead end of establishment politics: that dead end – which of course they do not see as a dead end – offers them a vehicle, as they perceive it, to campaign for the things they think right, without the potential embarrassment of being publicly spotlighted as a 'right-wing extremist' and, on the other hand, with the prospect of a career in parliament to boot.

It is an illusory picture but it is a highly attractive one, beckoning the would-be political crusader who – especially if he or she has a family to think of, lives in a nice house with a not insubstantial mortgage and wants, without years of waiting and hoping, to influence the political process.

These people are Tories. The main reason why they remain with the Conservative Party is that they perceive it – rightly at this particular moment – to be where the power is. However much they may feel critical of the party's leadership and policies, they believe that only by remaining and working in a mainstream party can they get anything practical done. Our challenge is to create a movement which, by its demonstrable success, offers a real alternative in this regard.

THE REAL DETERRENT

The message that I hope I can get over to my fellow patriots is that it is this – and this above all – which acts as the main deterrent to great numbers of good people whom we would like to see join and become involved with the BNP.

It is, at the same time, a deterrent which – human nature being what it is – is difficult for most folk to acknowledge, even to themselves. Far more comforting is it, because more satisfying to self-esteem, to protest that BNP policies are 'off-putting', 'too extreme', 'harsh', 'inhumane', suggestive of 'fascism', 'nazism' and other buzz-words guaranteed to dull the faculties, terminate reasoned debate and provide an escape route from the essential battlefield on which, at the end of the day, the struggle for the future of Britain will have to be fought.

The ordinary average voter – unlike the would-be political activist and prospective career politician – does not have to contend with the same deterrents. He or she is not interested in a life of full-time politics. He or she has no ambition to get into parliament in the foreseeable future, if ever. And, not least, he or she is able in secret to make a political choice by dropping a marked paper through a slot in a ballot box with no-one knowing from whom it comes.

But – one factor operates in the case of this voter in the same way as it operates in the case of the person who wants to make a much bigger commitment to politics. He or she wants to make a vote count. In the present political environment of Britain, this is looked at more often in a negative than in a positive way. The purpose is to prevent being elected the candidate one most opposes rather than help to be elected the candidate one most supports. And where this opposition is concerned, it is only serious in the case of the opposed candidate who is in with a chance; it matters little in the case of the 'also-rans'. In effective terms, it means that the voter who has come to detest a Labour government (or council) will most likely vote Tory simply because that provides the most effective way of stopping Labour getting in; likewise when the situation is reversed, and people vote Labour to keep the Tories out. In areas where Liberal Democrats are contenders or (as in the case of Wales or Scotland) where there are bogus 'nationalists' who could conceivably get elected, the issue is a shade more complex; but the same basic rule applies: a vote for a candidate or party seen as having no hope of winning is regarded as a wasted vote – no matter in what private sympathy the elector may be with the policies that candidate or party stand for, always assuming (and it can be a big assumption) that the voter is aware of them!

SUPERSTITION

Nevertheless, despite the vast amount of evidence there is that this is what determines people's political decisions – the decision of some to join and become active in political parties or the decision of many more to vote for them – the superstition still persists among many patriots that would-be joiners and would-be voters are inhibited by some consideration of 'moral conscience' from supporting a party that is presented as being 'offensive' from that standpoint, and that if such a party has its image revamped so as to make it less 'offensive' everything will change: the prospective joiners will join and the prospective voters will vote! All that is wrong at the moment is that we are perceived to be "not nice enough." Trim this policy and trim that policy. Smoothe this edge and polish that edge. Jettison our 'extremism' and assert our 'moderation' – do all these things and the legions of activists and voters just waiting for a new party with such an impeccable gloss will come flooding towards us. How great it would be if things were that simple!

I should not have to spell out to the reader that this is not a recipe for being nasty instead of nice, for going out of our way to exhibit 'extremism' and reject everything suggestive of moderation, for jackbooting our way around in the manner of Combat 18 and making no effort whatever to present an acceptable face to the British public. It should go without saying that imagery is important; that good public relations should be cultivated; that presentation of our policies in reasonable and civilised language is a practice at which we should aim at all times. These are truths so elementary that it becomes intensely irritating when people stand up and, with all the pomposity of schoolteachers talking down to kids, lecture us on the virtues of good image-making as if we had never heard of the idea.

The point of what I am saying is that the perceived notion of a 'bad image' is not the main factor – or indeed any significant factor at all – making for the present difficulty that we encounter in turning our party from a small group on the fringes of politics into a great national mass movement. The source of the difficulty must be sought in other directions, and I have tried here to indicate where those directions lie.

HOW MILLWALL WAS WON

Much has been made, in discussions among nationalists, of the BNP's council election victory in London's Millwall in 1993 and its subsequent loss of the seat won. But in all these discussions I have often heard much more nonsense spoken than practical political wisdom.

Prior to the winning of the seat, the party had acquired in the area a reputation of being tough, uncompromising and, if anything, rather strident in its way of going about things. Of course, in the election campaign itself its workers were on their very best behaviour, calling politely on doorsteps, speaking with courtesy and friendliness to the voters and in every way putting themselves across as people with whom the local Eastenders could identify as being part of the local community (as indeed most of them were). This was always the BNP rule in elections long before that event, and has remained the rule since. Any departure from the rule would be plain political idiocy.

But this campaign was conducted against a background of activity in the area over several years in which the party had in no way identified itself as a bunch of milksops. To abandoned, alienated and angry Eastenders it had become the last hope. It had staged several marches through the local streets, all of them attended by rowdy demonstrations by the far left. It had held public meetings with the same responses, some of these involving violence from its opponents – in the face of which its own men gave more than as good as they got. Far from this putting off the local people, it earned the BNP the reputation of being their sturdy champions. And neither had those local people been frightened away by the party's uncompromising stance on the issue of race and immigration; if anything, this was its strongest attraction for them.

Regularly, local newspapers screamed hate and horror against the BNP, urging voters to reject it. This had very little effect; on the contrary, to many it served as a recommendation!

Through this gradual build-up, supplewith Tony Blair – and a quite unscrupulous operation by the local Labour party whereby large numbers of Asians not previously on the electoral roll had, by some miracle, come to be on that roll! Far from the party's votes declining, they had in fact increased. In the previous election Derek Beackon obtained 1,480 votes; in the later election his vote rose to 2,041. The difference, of course, was that the Labour vote had risen more – mostly due to the factors I have stated. At the same time, all over the East End of London BNP candidates frightened the daylights out of the establishment by their near-successes in

MARCHING THROUGH THE EAST END

This was one of a number of high-profile public demonstrations mounted by the BNP in East London in the early 1990s prior to its election victory at Millwall in September 1993. When the party turned out, it won a very friendly reception from local people.

mented by systematic canvassing, the party broke through to win 20 per cent of the vote in Millwall ward in October 1992. In doing so it broke a mould. It eliminated in a stroke the idea that it could never win: it convinced large numbers of electors that a vote for the BNP was not a wasted vote. Clearly, a number who had sympathised with the party in that election but, thinking otherwise, voted elsewhere would vote for us the next time round.

This happened just eleven months afterwards, when the BNP candidate Derek Beackon obtained an historic 34 per cent of the poll and won the seat. What had made this possible? Precisely the demonstration on the previous occasion that the BNP was not an 'also-ran' but was up among the main contenders!

LABOUR 'DIRTY TRICKS'

So why, then, was the seat subsequently lost in the local government elections in May 1994? It certainly was not lost because the local voters decided in the meantime that the BNP was 'too extreme', having not thought any such thing eight months earlier! A combination of adverse circumstances worked against us on the latter occasion, the two main ones being a general nationwide swing to Labour due to the emerging honeymoon several areas. Plenty of campaigning energy and hard work were the causes of this upsurge, not a choirboy image nor pussy-footing policies.

DEMOGRAPHIC FACTOR

Our problem since Millwall has been that we have not succeeded in continuing and extending this 'winning streak'. There have been a number of factors accounting for this, most of them far beyond our own control. For a while, the Blair 'honeymoon' was one of these, though that is now turning sour. Another – in the case of the East End of London at least – has been the demographic trend whereby many of the hard core of our voters have moved out of our strong areas and into the neighbouring county beyond. This is an inevitable trend wherever ethnic minorities form sufficient of a large portion of the population to make life uncomfortable for the native Whites.

Electorally, the BNP's most fruitful areas are traditionally the ones where there is sufficient of an ethnic minority presence nearby to stimulate awareness of a race problem but not such a big one as to constitute a major portion of the vote.

If nationalists themselves have contributed, by their own errors, to further Millwalls not occurring, it has been mainly through through their still lamentable disunity. A number – getting entirely the wrong signals from failures at further breakthrough – have left the fold and wasted their time with alternative political experiments that have led nowhere. Some have tinkered with schemes for ‘new parties’. Others have sulked on the sidelines offering only carping criticism when they could have been far better employed putting their talents to work in something constructive for the BNP. Yet others have sought panaceas in the form of changes of political clothing.

All of which have amounted to evasions of the most important issues before us, and the priorities they impose on us. These are:-

(1) That we stand our ground and fight on, despite setbacks, recognising that these are part and parcel of the inevitable ups and downs of politics, and that we show patience in waiting for the pendulum, when it swings against us, to swing back towards us, not rush around like headless chickens when our aims are frustrated.

(2) That we recognise that the British National Party, whatever its problems and flaws, is the only practical vehicle for the pursuit of our political objectives, that there is no other.

(3) That we also recognise that the main deterrent to greater progress is not our public ‘image’ but our perceived political impotence resulting from no representation in parliament or on councils.

Obviously, the term ‘political impotence’ – suggestive as this is of ‘failure’ – must be qualified: we did not fail at Millwall; and numerous subsequent electoral efforts cannot fairly be described as failures in relation to the odds against us and the possibilities open to us – some recent local government results being cases in point. I speak of ‘failure’ only in the context understood by would-be supporters of the BNP among the general British public. To them, simply, we have failed if we hold no power!

THE TOP PRIORITY

How is this to be remedied? There has been building up a general consensus within our movement that top priorities must now be given to the acquisition of a few favourably situated local government seats. Of course, the importance of winning such seats is not a new development; for a long time it has been accepted. However, in the past the investment of effort and resources in this direction has had to compete with other undertakings prioritised equally highly. In the immediate future, these priorities must alter overwhelmingly in favour of a drive to register real victories in the one area where they might shortly be achieved: the election of BNP councillors. Millwall showed that it can be done. There must be more Millwalls – and before very long!

Such an achievement would change, overnight, the perspectives in which the British public views the BNP. It would also change the attitude displayed towards us by the mass media. This does not mean that those media would become less hostile; it does mean that their hostility would be tinged with respect, and that we would consequently be treated as if we ‘counted’, and thereby deserved a hearing – if only to appease our growing supporters.

This does not mean for one moment that the BNP should abandon the field of parliamentary elections – albeit that this is an area where we cannot expect our candidates to be victorious for some time yet. Regular challenges in the parliamentary field need to be made to remind the public of our presence as more than just a municipal party. Also, credibility from gaining council seats can greatly improve our support in parliamentary ones. When I won 7 per cent of the poll as BNP candidate in Dagenham in June 1994 it was in the wake of the party’s strong showing in local government elections just a month earlier – the one bearing crucially on the other.

Of course, it is one thing to state that the BNP needs to begin again winning local government seats; it is another thing entirely to put that resolution into practice. Also, no doubt, there will continue to be arguments, as there always have been, as to how best this can be done. But let us at least reach firm agreement on one thing: it is the image of our perceived political failure and weakness that provides, right now, the greatest deterrent to national support. Correspondingly, it will be an image of growing political success and strength that will provide the greatest boost to the removing of that deterrent. Recognition of this should at least clear the decks of much useless ballast in the way of internal debate, and enable us to concentrate on the real priorities ahead of us.

And at the end of the day there is no substitute for the success of the BNP. To those who continue working within the mainstream parties on the grounds that there is where the power is, we must put the challenging question: power to do what? No power which precludes taking the measures necessary for the political, economic, national and racial salvation of Britain – measures which past precedent makes clear will never be taken by the Tory party nor any of the others – is in the slightest way worth having.

LAUGH OF THE MONTH

Editor gets protest letter from librarian

Some wicked ‘racists’ are apparently on the prowl in Newport, in South Wales, and have actually committed the infamous act of leaving copies of Spearhead in the local library!

Last month our editor received a letter from a lady describing herself as the Acting Lending Librarian. It went as follows:-

Dear Mr. Tyndall,

I write with concern about your publication Spearhead. I represent the lending services Department of Newport Central Library and Information Service.

It would appear that one of your subscribers has taken it upon themselves (sic!) to circulate the magazine Spearhead by leaving copies in the library.

Newport County Borough Council has an equal opportunities policy, recognising its obligations under the Race Regulations (sic!) Act 1976. The Council is committed to take positive action to eliminate discrimination. The content of Spearhead quite obviously contravenes this statement.

Equally, the library stock policy states: “We will not knowingly purchase material, the prime purpose of which is to encourage discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, creed, gender or sexual orientation or to openly encourage violence.

I can appreciate the difficulty you may have in isolating any individual responsible for taking it upon themselves (sic again!) to contravene council policy. However, I am sure that a communication network exists with your subscribers in South Wales.

We feel that it is important to inform such people, via yourself that this and any other racist material is not acceptable in our library and information centres. Each copy found is destroyed. Staff have been asked to be vigilant in locating racist literature and removing it from public areas.

I would be grateful if you would regard this request with the gravity it deserves.

Yours sincerely

Catherine Harrison (Acting Lending Librarian).

Well, the first assurance that I can give Mrs/Miss Harrison is that I most certainly will regard her request with the gravity it deserves – although this may not mean quite what she has in mind! The next observation that must be made is that if the body she represents is, in fact, an ‘information service’ it should be pleased to be providing the public with information instead of denying it information – as a ban on Spearhead (or any other publication for that matter) suggests it is doing.

And what about eliminating discrimination? What is such a ban but discrimination?

I take note that copies of Spearhead will be destroyed. How – by ritual burning? If so, I would love to be invited!

As for the culprit whom Mrs/Miss Harrison hopes can be located (though she admits the difficulty), she has my promise that, if found, he will be shot at dawn!

WARNING: FANTASISTS AND DECEIVERS AT WORK!

DURING recent months, Britain has seen mass protests by Vauxhall car workers in Luton and Ellesmere Port. These demonstrations weren't about pay or working conditions, but rather were concerned with security and continued existence of jobs at those plants. Insecurity and de-industrialisation caused by globalisation and privatisation are the overwhelming worries now, and the prime causes of any alleged industrial militancy, especially among car and steel workers, air-traffic controllers and postal employees.

IAN BUCKLEY looks at some of the recent effusions from the New Labour spin-factory

But David Blunkett, head man for 'Education and Employment', writes that:-

"My biggest worry is whether we have enough skilled people to meet the demands of booming Britain... Jobs are there for the taking in most parts of the country... Yes there are fewer jobs in the traditional industries ... In every area of the country employers have jobs to fill, and people who are looking for jobs are able to get them..."

Rest assured that there is much more of this appalling guff, but I'll spare readers from it. But why then, if this is so, are all the Vauxhall car-builders so terrified about losing their employment, granted that the work they do is often heavy, tedious and relatively poorly-paid? After all, Blunkett has said that there are all these multitudes of easy well-paid jobs around!

It seems surprising that the Vauxhall workers haven't departed en masse to fill all these abundant well-paid vacancies that apparently exist all over the place. Six thousand redundant Welsh steel workers have no reason to feel depressed, or to mutter darkly about the destruction of entire communities. We should believe Blunkett instead, who is confident that hundreds of successful internet companies are waiting to offer work to these jobless unfortunates! As in other cases that also come to mind, we may ask New Labour: if what Mr. Blunkett says is really true, why do you find it necessary to shout about it so often and so loudly?

Blunkett's insistence on compulsion to force the recalcitrant into bogus cheap-labour schemes is ridiculous, given his own arguments. Such measures weren't necessary in the 'fifties and 'sixties when there really were all those jobs available, so why should they be needed now? All sheer rotten fantasy and pretence, as the counterfeit politicians make reassuring noises about prosperity, while the financial vultures rip the carcass of British industry apart.

In fact, as is the case with Blair, Blunkett doesn't even write his own purported words; that 'honour' belongs to his party's press secretary Alistair Campbell, former Mirror hack and major contributor to Forum porn magazine [he made up the letters]. The daydreams he records have certainly changed over the years, but rest assured they are still pretty weird! Didn't these people also try to tell us that the dismal Millennium Dome would be a fantastic success, the self-same Dome that's now a semi-derelict embarrassment and is being sold off piecemeal for a fraction of its true value.

Fiasco of the Dome

Mr. Blair [or is it Mr. Campbell?], I fling your own words back at you: "... it [the Millennium Dome] embodies the spirit of confidence and adventure in Britain and the spirit of the future in the world." But auctioneers Henry Butcher are presently in charge of selling off the exhibits and equipment from the Dome, including some parts of the Body Zone, which is too big to dismantle completely. John Cowing, director of the auctioneers, has said: "We will be selling the heart, the brains, the eye and the public lice from the Body Zone." Something oddly symbolic about that last sentence, I feel... Nearly a billion pounds spent on a disaster, while pensioners freeze... Were not the brains and heart sold off years ago?

FEWER JOBS IN INDUSTRY

At least Campbell/Blunkett do concede that there are fewer jobs in the traditional industries. Normal folk know that such phrases are euphemistic code for acres of crumbled brickwork in Stoke-on-Trent or for largish trees growing out of the sides of former Merseyside factories. Blunkett doesn't note that bogus self-employment has been forced upon huge numbers of workers, who are now deprived of sick pay, holidays, bonuses or overtime, as they're turned into one-man bands selling off their contract labour to the highest bidder. But why should the bigwigs worry when they can feather their own nests? As well as scraping by on his £96,500 salary plus expenses, 'socialist' Blunkett also makes £700 a month by renting out his former home, while he enjoys free accommodation in a luxury flat provided by the taxpayer. Not bad for someone who has reached his middle fifties without having had a proper job. Nor is he the only firebrand socialist to discover the delights of unfettered capitalism, his fellow Minister Michael Meacher owning at least eight(!) homes.

You know, once we had 'Tories' constructing a fantasy castle of a proud and prosperous Britain, while the real country continued to dissolve into a welter of crime, drugs and industrial decline. Now 'New Labour' behaves exactly the same, while the Tories are permitted to make a few sensible comments. The two main parties are irrelevant. The real government stays in office all the time, and the nominal ruling party just assists in pushing the destructive agenda that's stayed the same for years.

Would that those words could knock all of our people out of their accustomed state of dazed and weary dreaming, albeit accompanied by occasional grumbles as they drift along! Why did this generation sleep on when low politicians and businessmen destroyed so much of the society that our ancestors spent centuries building, all just for an inconsequential handful of gold?

Like Government Ministers, the so-called quality newspapers have also largely retreated into a world of low-grade fantasy, while perhaps maintaining a couple of interesting old-style columnists apiece. Slick and empty material, its language drawn from the worlds of advertising and public relations, forms the noxious padding occupying 90 per cent of the pages. A new sort of 'non-journalism' has become dominant, with scarcely anyone much caring or even noticing.

INFLUENCE OF TELEVISION

Television is even worse in this regard, with its emphasis on prurience, morbid spectacles and wall-to-wall sport. Mind you, repeats of old football matches from twenty or thirty years ago do have certain points of interest. In those days footballers tended to look like normal people, and didn't have the disconcerting resemblance to mutants from another planet that they often do today. One such clean-cut player was Liverpool's Steve Heighway, whom a commentator was keen to point out as a very sensible chap. This was because Heighway didn't just have to rely on 'insecure' football but had a career as a teacher to fall back upon. But now a complete social reversal has occurred in quite a short span of time: the football players make millions, while the poorly-paid teachers are harassed, demoralised or even driven to suicide by a crumbling educational system.

Those who have a sense of history and are able to see the bigger picture will be reminded of the final days of the Roman Empire, when the ignorant plebs worked themselves into a frenzy over some fashionable charioteer or gladiator (Bread and Circuses), while corruption flourished within and the barbarians approached the gates outside. The most venal, corrupt and incompetent government in our history – a title which every successive government of recent years seems to merit – is quite satisfied with this prevailing state of illusion and self-deception, so it is our great task to begin the awakening of Britain, thus halting and reversing the drift to destruction and setting the nation on the road to recovery.

LATEST VIDEO

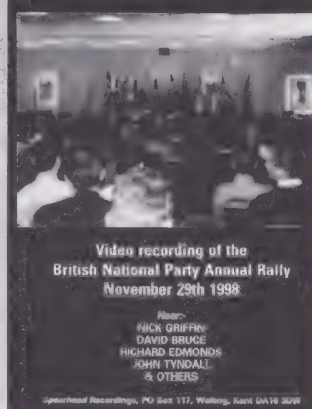

Rally '98 is the video recording of the British National Party's Annual Rally, taking place on the 29th November 1998. After a decision by the BNP not to put this film on the market, its production and distribution were taken over by Spearhead.

The rally was possibly the best in the party's history. It was held at a smart venue in the West Midlands after successful attempts had been made by political opponents, including the Board of Deputies of British Jews, to get previous bookings of venues cancelled.

After many interesting reports by regional and departmental representatives, the film features speeches by Nick Griffin (then Publicity Director), Richard Edmonds (then National Organiser) and John Tyndall (then party leader). An especially touching feature is the hugely successful collection appeal by Dave Bruce, which raised a staggering £12,000 for the then all-important Euro Election Fund. Less than a month afterwards, Dave was no longer with us, having been tragically taken away by an unexpected heart attack. See and hear the speakers at this stirring event as if you were there!

Rally '98 is available at £15.87 post-free, with a 30 per cent discount for all orders of three or over. Make cheques out to Spearhead Recordings and send to PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

The following is the text, slightly abridged, of a radio broadcast made on the programme American Dissident Voices on September 30th 2000. One or two deletions have been made so as to comply with British laws which make critical remarks against certain racial groups a criminal offence. Other texts of ADV broadcasts can be obtained by writing to: PO Box 330, Hillsboro, WV 24946, U.S.A.

I received a telephone call this week from a woman I know in California. She's a member of my organisation, the National Alliance, and she is using her computer and her web site to disseminate information about a problem I have spoken about with you on several occasions in the past, and that is the growing trade in White sex slaves. Organised Jewish crime gangs recruit young women in Russia, Ukraine, and other countries of Eastern Europe whose economies were ruined by decades under communism. The recruiters promise the young women high-paying employment in Israel as secretaries or receptionists, then force them to become prostitutes after they arrive. The government of Israel doesn't interfere.

The woman I know in California who is helping to publicise this terrible and growing white-slavery problem called to exchange information with me on recent developments, but she also shared with me her frustration over the difficulty of getting the public to pay attention and to become indignant. Even when they know what's going on, people are just too jaded, too passive, too lacking in self-confidence to stand up to this assault on our race, she lamented.

And, unfortunately, that's true of most of the public. I try to break through this public passivity with these broadcasts by choosing topics that should catch people's imagination and rouse their indignation – although it's difficult for me to imagine anything more provocative than this exploitation of young white women.

UNFAIRNESS

One thing that many people respond to is anything which is blatantly unfair, anything which offends our people's inborn sense of fairness. I'll try that approach today. I'm sure you've all heard about the ongoing and very profitable campaign of certain Jews to collect reparations from everyone in sight for their alleged sufferings during the Second World War, which ended more than 55 years ago. They've been cashing in big on the so-called 'Holocaust'. They've bribed politicians in half the state legislatures in America to pass laws requiring that all public school children take classes on the 'Holocaust' and be taught about the unique 'victim' status of the Jews, about how they have suffered more than anyone else and therefore deserve more in the way of compensation from the Gentile world. They tell us that their reason for harping on their 'Holocaust' all the time is to prevent it from happening again.

But really, the main reason is that

The picture here shows US and Filipino prisoners of the Japanese about to be force-marched to appalling POW camps in 1942. More than 9,000 died. We hear little about the Holocaust in the war in Asia because there is not a hugely powerful ethnic lobby with an interest in exploiting it.

they're making tons of money from it.

On previous programmes I've talked with you about how they've parlayed their losses during the Second World War into a steady flow of gold into the pockets of Jews in Israel and around the world during the past half-century: scores of billions of dollars from Germany, from Switzerland, from France, from the Netherlands, from Britain. I've told you how the United States government acted as the Jewish lobby's bully boy, coercing other countries into coughing up whatever the Jews demanded: billions of dollars for dormant bank accounts in Switzerland, more than 60 billion dollars in reparations from Germany, hundreds of millions of dollars from France and the Netherlands for property the Jews claimed belonged to them before the war, then back to Germany last year with a claim for more billions of dollars for unpaid wages to Jews who say that they were forced to work in the German defence industry during the war. And finally billions of dollars in claims from the United States because many American companies were doing business in Germany before the war. The American media and the US Government have been behind the Jews all the way in the enforcement of these claims.

JEWS NOT THE ONLY VICTIMS

Well, you know, the Jews weren't the only ones who had losses during the Second World War. And the Germans weren't the only ones who forced prisoners to work. The biggest employer of forced labour by far was our gallant communist ally, the Soviet Union. The Japanese also forced many American prisoners of war to work.

When the Jews began demanding compensation last year from German companies for work the Jews were forced to do in Europe during the war, their Gentile step'n'fetchits in the California legislature hastily passed a new law allowing persons who had done forced labour to sue their former employers for wages. The California law clearly was intended to allow Jews to sue German companies and American companies with branches in Germany. Well, sir, a number of very insensitive American veterans from the Pacific theatre of operations who had been forced to work in Japanese coal mines as prisoners during the war just didn't get it – they didn't understand that the law was intended to benefit Jews only, and that Gentiles need not apply. So they sued the Japanese companies who had used them as slave labourers more than 55 years ago. Among the defendant Japanese companies were Mitsubishi Corporation, Nippon Steel Corporation, and a number of the other largest Japanese companies.

As you can imagine, the powers that be were not happy about these uppity

Gentiles trying to horn in on the Jews' private racket. I mean, really, if everyone starts demanding equal rights with the Jewish lobby, where will it end? The Jews will have no special privileges at all. Well, Madeleine Albright put a stop to the suit against the Japanese companies in a hurry. She has vigorously supported the efforts by her fellow Jews to extort reparations from everyone in sight, but she had her State Department tell the court in California that the suit by the veterans should be dismissed. And that's exactly what happened on Thursday of last week.

You can read about it yourself in the September 21 Associated Press report from San Francisco. The report begins, and I quote: "Surviving World War II prisoners of war who allege they were used as slave labourers by some of Japan's biggest corporations cannot seek compensation from the companies, a federal judge ruled Thursday." – end quote. Then the judge told the veterans, in effect, that they should be thankful they're still alive, and that should be enough for them. Now, I'll stick my neck out and make a little prediction here: when the Jews' lawsuits against American companies they claim made a profit from Jewish labour in Germany during the war come to court, the verdict will be different. The State Department will take the side of the Jews, and the Jews will get every cent they're demanding. And anyone who tells them that they should be thankful to still be alive and that should be enough for them will be torn to shreds by the media and condemned as a 'hater' and an 'anti-Semite'. That's my prediction, because that's the way the system is rigged. What do you think?

DIFFERENT RULE FOR AMERICANS

But really, isn't that something? American veterans who were abused atrociously as prisoners of war by the Japanese can't get a cent from the Japanese. The Clinton government, acting through Madeleine Albright's State Department, takes the side of the Japanese. But when certain Jews, who had never set foot in America until after the war, never served this country in any way, make claims against Americans, they'll get everything they demand, and they'll get it with the help of the US government. It's good to remember that the veterans who last week were denied compensation from the Japanese for their slave labour were fighting for America in a war that, at the root, was a war to destroy the enemies of the Jews, a war to destroy Hitler and his government. In that war the American companies from which the Jews now are demanding compensation were indispensable to the American war effort, regardless of any profit they may have made from German subsidiaries. Without the participation of the Ford Motor Company, for example, and the other big American companies from which the Jews are demanding money now, America couldn't have won the war. America wouldn't have had any trucks or tanks or jeeps without Ford and General Motors, from whom certain Jews are seeking blood money.

These Jews, in effect, are demanding money from us for saving their hides in the Second World War. And the men who fought to save their hides don't get anything but a kick in the teeth. Now, perhaps you believe that these Jews shouldn't be blamed for trying to take us to the cleaners, if we're stupid enough to let ourselves be taken to the cleaners. But what do you think about the attitude of our Government? And what about the attitude of the mass media, which, in fact, is ultimately more important than that of the Government? In the coming months the media will be full of stories about the poor, deserving Jews who are entitled to compensation from those wicked American companies which may have made a profit from their labour in Germany before or during the war, but I doubt that you'll be seeing much beyond that one Associated Press report I cited about the inability of American veterans who were slave labourers for the Japanese to collect compensation.

FLAG COMPLAINT

How does that strike your sense of fairness? I'll give you another example. In South Carolina there's an unrenowned Southern businessman named Maurice Bessinger. Mr. Bessinger owns a chain of barbecue restaurants – Piggie Parks – and he manufactures his own brand of barbecue sauce, which until a few days ago was sold in more than 90 Wal-Mart stores in six Southern states. Then some Politically Correct busybody complained to Wal-Mart management that Bessinger displays the Confederate flag at his Piggie Park restaurants and demanded that Wal-Mart stop selling his barbecue sauce because his display of Confederate flags offended Blacks – excuse me, African-Americans! Well, of course, during the past few days Wal-Mart has been falling all over itself in its scramble to remove Bessinger's sauce from its shelves.

Why do you think that is? Do you think it's because Wal-Mart management believes it would be immoral to continue selling Bessinger's barbecue sauce? I'll guarantee that's not the reason. Wal-Mart couldn't care less about the political beliefs of its suppliers. The reason is that Wal-Mart is scared to death that the busybody who demanded it stop selling the sauce will go to the media with his complaint, and Wal-Mart knows what position the media will take on the matter. Wal-Mart is afraid that the media will stir up a boycott.

Now, suppose that I went to Wal-Mart with the complaint that some product Wal-Mart is selling is manufactured by a company owned by a Jew who has given money to Israel – and believe me, there are thousands of such products on Wal-Mart's shelves, because most Jewish manufacturers have given money to Israel. An example of such a product is almost any video cassette with a Hollywood movie on it. Suppose I said in my complaint that Israel routinely tortures Palestinian prisoners, illegally stockpiles biological, chemical, and nuclear weapons, and is home to the largest sex-slave trade in the world, that it is immoral to sell products which provide money to Israel, and that I would go to the media with my complaint if Wal-Mart continued selling the Jewish product.

Well, of course, I'd be laughed out of Wal-Mart's administrative offices, because Wal-Mart knows that the media won't have anything negative to say about Wal-Mart's sale of products made by a Jewish supporter of Israel.

POWER THE ARBITER

The point of my comments today is that it is not morality or justice which governs the world in which we live; it is power. Despite what you were taught in school, we don't live in a country governed by laws; we live in a country governed by men. The laws mean whatever the most powerful men say they mean, and they are enforced accordingly.

Many years ago I testified in Washington before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations when it was holding public hearings on the ratification of the so-called 'Genocide Convention', which would require the United States to enact 'speech-crime' legislation similar to that in Canada and many European countries: that is, legislation which would criminalise any speech or writing which any identifiable racial, ethnic, or religious group might find offensive or threatening. While waiting to testify I spoke with another witness who also was waiting to testify. I found that he shared my views on many things, but whereas I intended to testify against ratification, he intended to testify in favour of the Genocide Convention. I was puzzled, and I asked him why.

In turn he asked me: "Have you ever seen the Talmud? It's full of hatred and offensive statements against Gentiles." I answered him: "Yes, I know that – but so what?" "Don't you see?" he said: "The Genocide Convention will get all the rabbis locked up because of what's in their Talmud, and then the Jews will be out of business."

Well, I was left speechless by the man's astounding naïvety. He really believed that 'speech crime' laws would be applied even-handedly, to Jews and Gentiles alike. I didn't even waste my breath trying to make him understand that the world doesn't work that way: that it doesn't matter half so much what laws are on the books as it does how those laws are interpreted and enforced by the men with the power to enforce them; that 'speech-crime' laws would be enforced against us but not against the Jews, as long as the Jews had the power of the media on their side. And the general public would never even be aware of the hypocrisy and injustice involved, because they wouldn't have a clue about the Talmud unless it were dramatised for them on television in soap operas, over and over and over again, until it finally sank in.

I've encountered the same sort of foolishness from well-meaning but very naïve men who have spent a great deal of time researching the law and have told me that such-and-such an amendment to the Constitution was never properly ratified and therefore is invalid. For example, I've had men tell me in all seriousness that the 16th Amendment, which in 1913 laid the basis for the Federal income tax, is invalid, and so none of us really has to pay income taxes. They believe that if they present the results of their legal research in court, the court will have to agree that they don't have to pay their income taxes. When I warned them that they were likely to end up in prison, they wanted to show me their legal research to prove that they were right. I told them that their legal research is entirely irrelevant. What is relevant is that the politicians – including the judges in the Federal courts – are dependent on the money collected from income taxes: income-tax money keeps the public trough at which they feed full, and they aren't about to let any defect in the law empty their trough. We could argue with them about it, but in the end all that will matter is that they have more armed thugs at their disposal than we do.

POWER OF THE MEDIA

I'm not saying that all laws are completely irrelevant, that it doesn't make any difference at all what the law says. The Government still has to keep up a pretence of fairness and justice. The politicians themselves don't care about justice, and the system of which they are parts is thoroughly corrupt, but it is important to them to keep the public from realising that. And the mass media are the key to what the public realises and what it doesn't. If the average person doesn't see something on television – repeatedly – he won't be aware of it. And his powers of discrimination are such that it doesn't make any difference whether what he sees on television is true or false; if he sees it often enough he'll believe it. And if he doesn't see it on television he won't even be aware of it.

The media are the key to what the Government can and cannot get away with. As long as we have a political system where the leaders of the Government are chosen by a popular vote, the media will be the key to who gets elected and to how the Government behaves. The media are the key to the behaviour of the courts, the key to how a particular law will be interpreted and enforced, the key to the attitude of a Federal judge toward a claim for compensation for slave labour. The media are the key to the behaviour of big business, such as Wal-Mart, and they are the key to the public's perception of, and reaction to, Israel's slave trade in White women.

We all wish that we had a moral government and a just court system, but as long as we don't it is power for which we must strive, not morality or justice. Only after we have power can we hope for morality or justice. And the key to power is neither guns nor money, but it is the ability to communicate effectively with the public, the ability to influence the public's perception of the world. If the key to power were simply money, then Bill Gates wouldn't have to be worried now about the Clinton government's effort to destroy Microsoft. Last year he should have taken some of the 90 billion or so dollars he had at that time and bought a couple of television networks. Then he could make those Jews in the Clinton Justice Department back off in a hurry.

Well, it's not quite that simple. You must not only buy a television network; you also must staff it properly and use it intelligently.

There's not much point in buying CBS from Sumner Redstone, for example, if the same Jews at CBS will remain in charge of editing the news and designing the entertainment programming. You will have to find hundreds of talented and properly motivated people who are as good as the Jews are at shaping public perceptions, and then you will have to rebuild the whole network with these new people.

WHAT CAN BE DONE

We can't do that now. We can't outshoot the government, and we can't outspend the Jewish lobby. But we can nevertheless continue building our ability to communicate with the public. Without a television network we can't influence the lemmings, but we can influence the two per cent or so of the public that is capable of independent thinking. And we are influencing more and more people in that two per cent. The National Alliance member I mentioned at the beginning of this broadcast, the woman in California who is using the Internet to help spread awareness of the Jewish trade in white women, is only one of thousands. I hear from dozens of new people every day, people I have never heard from previously, who have been awakened by the American Dissident Voices message or are in the process of being awakened.

If we want a moral government and a system of justice which is truly just – if we want ever to have a healthy, white world again for our grandchildren and their grandchildren – then we must have power, and for the time being the way to that power is to continue reaching and influencing the independent-minded two per cent of our people. We need more money, of course, and one of these days we may need more guns. But for now we need more moral individuals to wake up to their responsibilities; we need more individuals with a sense of justice to use their intelligence and their talents to help us in our effort to communicate with our people. We need more people like that woman in California – and we're getting them. Eventually we'll get the lemmings too!

FRIENDS OF SPEARHEAD

Friends of Spearhead is a support group that has been formed for the purpose of ensuring our magazine's continued survival in new circumstances in which it is going to be facing reduced sales and advertising through the British National Party network due to the decision of the party leadership to launch a new and separate magazine.

Members of Friends of Spearhead will be asked to pay a subscription of a minimum of £10 a month, in return for which they may, if they wish, receive five copies of each monthly issue for redistribution (by whatever means they prefer). This subscription may be paid by ordinary cheque or by direct debit, in which case details of our bank and account number will be supplied on request.

In addition, Friends of Spearhead will be undertaking certain other promotions, details of which will be advertised as they occur.

We hope very much that our readers and supporters, not only in the UK but around the world, will rally to help us in this new project.

Friends of Spearhead can be contacted at our usual address: PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

I HATE...

- People who yap loudly away on mobile 'phones on trains, in cafes and restaurants, in shops and when walking down the street – in fact in any public or private place where we have to listen to them.
- People who chuck litter about instead of using the bins normally provided (if there are no bins they should wait till they find one).
- People who fill their shopping bags with purchases at supermarkets before paying – while those behind them have to wait.
- Males who wear studs and ear-rings and baseball caps back to front.
- People who have jungle music playing at deafening volume on 'ghetto-blasters' so that all around have to hear it.
- Motorists who use their horns unnecessarily.
- Men who talk very fast (not so bad with women).
- Politicians who sell Britain out while hiding behind the flag.
- Journalists who constantly use the word 'chilling' (almost invariably in reference to the activities of nationalists).
- People who call queers 'gays'.
- Men who try to ape women and women who try to ape men.
- People who refer to the war dead as having given their lives for 'freedom' – whereas in reality they gave their lives for their country.
- Footballers who prance and gesture like madmen before the crowd just after scoring a goal.
- Sportsmen generally (Whites, that is) who greet each other with the traditional black handshake after one of them has performed a worthy deed.
- TV advertisements so inane that they insult the intelligence of the viewing public (and rarely leave them remembering the product being advertised).
- Constant sex scenes in movies (as the actress Lauren Bacall once said, "Who wants to watch other people doing it?")
- The compensation culture.
- Journalists and broadcasters who address you by your first name the very first time they encounter you (a 'friendliness' you know is phony because most of these people hate our guts).
- Unmarried women who insist on being called 'Ms ...'.
- Men who use the word 'exciting' – except in the context of a sporting encounter meriting that description.
- Journalists and broadcasters who discuss the lives of movie and pop performers as if these people were at the centre of the world and doing something really important.
- Descriptions of World War II in which allied soldiers are described as fighting 'doggedly' while their adversaries are spoken of as fighting 'fanatically'.
- Town and city councillors who travel abroad on 'fact-finding' tours, which are really freebie holidays at the taxpayers' expense.
- Left-wing writers, playwrights, artists, film-makers, etc., being described as 'anti-establishment' when in reality they are pillars of the establishment.
- The sanctimonious tone of voice adopted by TV commentators when reporting on Third World misery – calculated to make the viewers feel guilty.
- British holidaymakers in foreign parts who behave in such a manner as to bring their country into contempt.
- The zoological noises coming from the benches in parliamentary debates, which remind one of rowdy kids shouting 'yah' at each other.
- Not black people, but white people who slobber over black people.
- People who talk of the 'Holocaust' as if it were the only episode of human suffering in history and Jews the only victims.

A LATTER-DAY PHANTASMAGORIA

*All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players...*

William Shakespeare

THE POWER OF TELEVISION is by far the greatest danger that today confronts the British people. Contrary to what many patriotic Britons imagine, TV is much more dangerous to our way of life and culture than immigration, racial integration, abortion, homosexuality, incest, drugs, political correctness and the treasonable ambitions of the Europhiles. This is because TV is used to promote all these iniquitous things. TV is also a greater danger to us than books, newspapers and magazines as it has such a hypnotic effect and so easily intrudes into our homes and consciences. It takes a certain amount of effort and intelligence to read a book or newspaper, whereas watching TV requires no such effort. It is tailor-made to attract the attention and influence the mores of the least thinking and most slothful members of our society.

During the past few years, BBC TV and ITV have been increasingly used to peddle vice, perversion and violence, and to condition the moral attitudes of viewers. In this they have been remarkably successful, and by their malign influence many of our people have been reduced to the level of mindless zombies. This has been achieved with the tacit approval of the politicians, who themselves use TV to spread their propaganda and to inflate their own egos by appearing on the screen as frequently as they can. Can anyone remember the last time any politician complained about the gratuitous drivel that nightly appears on our screens?

The result of the intrusive effect of TV is that many people now live in a world of sheer unreality. TV has become a latter-day phantasmagoria. Many conversations overheard these days consist of discussions about the TV programmes screened the previous evening, particularly the so-called 'soaps', which some people seem to believe are fact! This fantasy-world scenario even affects our political leaders. As Peter Hitchens points out in The Abolition of Britain, a brilliant analysis of the state of our country published last year, Tony Blair and William Hague both made official statements concerning the fictional imprisonment of a fictional character in ITV's Coronation Street. Said Mr. Blair: "It is clear to anyone with eyes in their head that Deirdre Rachid is innocent and should be free." (it is a pity he does not extend the same sympathy to Mr. Tony Martin who continues to languish in gaol for shooting dead a serial burglar who broke into his farmhouse). Said Mr. Hague: "The whole nation is deeply concerned about Deirdre Rachid." Of course, neither Messrs. Blair nor Hague is stupid enough to believe this nonsense, but they are both prepared to subscribe to it if they think that it might be worth a few votes at the next election. Although perhaps Mr. Blair really feels at home in this fantasy world – after all, his own stepmother-in-law was known by her Coronation Street persona, Elsie Tanner.

GRIM PROPHECY

In a chapter headed 'Telescreen Triumphs', Mr. Hitchens begins in his book with a quotation from a letter written by T. S. Eliot to The Times in 1950: "I find only anxiety and apprehension about the social effects of this pastime, and especially about its effect on small children." Although Eliot probably did not foresee the full extent of the damage that TV would do to children, his worry about its effects can be seen to have been percipient. The inability of many children and teenagers today to read or write, or even speak with any degree of fluency, is in large measure a direct consequence of a childhood spent in front of a TV screen or playing computer games. As Hitchens says, "...children aged two and three were watching as much as eighteen hours of television a week, 80 per cent of it without an adult present in the room." In such circumstances how can children learn to master speech or interact with other people? is it any wonder that such children, abandoned by their parents to TV, which Hitchens calls a "national childminding service," grow up to be ill-adjusted, if not monsters? [how can matters be otherwise when the Government employs financial and tax policies aimed at dissuading mothers from staying at home to look after their children? Evidently

T.V. POISON

This is a scene from a new show launched last month described as "the most shockingly PC show on TV." Called Metrossexuality, the show was broadcast on Channel Four and featured 'gay' and lesbian sex, 'bi-sex', drugs, foul language, bare flesh, murder, alcoholism and promiscuity. And – oh yes! – there's plenty of multi-racialism as well. The picture here gives some idea of the level at which this garbage is aimed.

look after their children? Evidently the Government would rather mothers were out at work; and so TV increasingly performs the function of bringing up children in loco parentis.

EFFECT ON FAMILY LIFE AND NATIONAL MORES

TV is thus nurturing a generation of couch-potatoes, some of whom, in their attempts to emulate the violence and rapine they witness on the screen, will inevitably become violent themselves. However, it not only has a detrimental effect on children. Many adults, also, are corrupted by its baleful influence. These destructive effects are threefold. First, they stifle normal family conversation and interaction in the home, thereby inhibiting the acquisition of fluency by the young, and generating a contempt for law and order. Second, they promote violence, licentiousness, perversions and bad language – viewers are nightly regaled with a surfeit of explicit sex, gang rapes, homosexual behaviour and F-words. And third, they enable politically motivated TV producers to brainwash the populace with their anti-British and pro-internationalist dogmas. The left-wing propaganda daily churned out by the TV mind-benders is not solely confined to the actual programmes screened; perceptive viewers cannot but fail to recognise the same traits in many TV adverts. As Jean Raspall wrote in The Camp of the Saints, “You know that in advertising, today, it’s only the Left that sells.”

Apart from their political agendas and their own personal careers, TV producers are primarily concerned with one thing: audience ratings. It is a mystery to me why the BBC should be concerned with trying to compete with the ITV companies when its revenue is guaranteed by the television licence fee. Nevertheless, in their endeavours to achieve the best audience ratings, both BBC and ITV pander to people’s basest instincts and even the foulest perversions. Many of the plays and ‘soaps’ (which Hitchens refers to as ‘Suburbs of the Mind’) that are screened dwell on such unsavoury topics as rape, abortion, incest, AIDS, homosexuality, paedophilia, miscegenation and drug-addiction in their ‘storylines’. In defending the inclusion of these topics in their plots, the producers argue: “But it’s real life; it happens.” Yes it does; but how much of it happens because weak-minded and easily influenced people are inveigled into emulating the actors and actresses who take part in these sordid sagas? And it cannot be denied that the parts played by some performers seem to be repeated in their own personal lives. The private lives of the so-called ‘stars’ and ‘celebrities’ (most of whom but for TV would be complete nonentities) leave much to be desired. Indeed, many of them go out of the way to publicise them!

DISTORTED VIEW

Though I am not a great TV viewer myself, the little I do watch convinces me that unless something is done very soon to control the content of TV programmes our people will lose all sense of morality and decency, and they will get a distorted view of the truth of what is actually happening in the world. It is indeed ironic that at a time when almost anything is acceptable on TV, the one thing that is strictly verboden is genuine free speech. Patriots intrepid enough to suggest that continuous immigration and the presence of ‘asylum-seekers’ are having a destructive effect on our country are seldom, if ever, reported on news programmes, and are hardly ever invited to express their views on current affairs programmes. If truly patriotic people appear in plays and ‘soaps’ they are invariably portrayed as uneducated oafs or mindless thugs.

In the early days of television the poet Oliver St. John Gogarty disparagingly referred to the TV set as “that bloody illuminated coal-scuttle in the corner,” and suggested that it ought to be chucked out. Perhaps he was right. If we all had a mind to throw our sets on the nearest rubbish tip we would, at a stroke, deprive the mind-benders of a tool that gives them enormous power and influence. And our country might be all the better for it.

BRITAIN will be getting a £233 million chunk of a £2 billion European grant to help asylum-seekers and refugees sent up businesses here.

Five per cent of the grant – around £11.6 million – will fund controversial schemes to help the asylum-seekers find work even if they have not been given permission to stay in Britain.

The rest of the cash, from the European Commission, will be allocated over the next five years to refugees who have been granted asylum in this country “and to organisations promoting the interests of ethnic minorities.” (The Mail on Sunday, 28.1.01).

FOUR Jewish TV viewers made a complaint about ‘anti-semitism’ following a scene in East Enders last October.

In the scene Mo Harris was contemplating buying stolen pork. When she could not make up her mind the trader asked: “Are you Jewish?” This the Jewish viewers apparently found offensive.

The complaint was rejected.

FOR ‘Black History Month’ last year, Barnet (North London) Youth service devised a Trivial Pursuit-type game to celebrate and educate awareness of black people in history. In the game a question was asked: “Do you know when Britain had her last black queen?” The answer, apparently unchallenged, was that the queen was Phillippa of Hainault. The year? 1330. Barnet Life, a publication issued by Barnet Council, joined in this piece of historical revisionism, adding that Edward the Black Prince was the son of Phillippa. Said the paper of Edward’s name: “It is usually taught that this was because he always dressed in black, but was it?”

about ‘racist chants’ at football grounds, so she persuaded the local club, Everton, to let her write an article about the Holocaust in the club’s programme printed for its cup tie against Tranmere Rovers, played on – you’ve guessed it – Holocaust Memorial Day!

THE LORD CHANCELLOR has ruled that magistrates should no longer be expected to dress in a sober and respectable fashion. This traditional requirement, so his department has announced, is outdated because it indicates ‘cultural bias’ and could give offence.

This is part of a shake-up following an ‘equality report’ drawn up by a group of Lord Irvine’s officials and advisers. The report also calls for quotas for ‘under-represented groups’ on the bench.

BLACK ACTIVIST Delroy Lindo has been given a public apology by Scotland Yard after claiming he had been racially harassed by police officers. Mr. Lindo is seeking £1 million in compensation. In a report by Deputy Assistant Commissioner Tariq Ghaffur it was admitted that Lindo had been the victim of ‘negative stereotyping’ because of his record of 17 violent criminal offences, including rape.

Don't mention the Holocaust!

A BIG ROW broke out recently in the ranks of the United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP). Yes, another one!

Apparently, the party's Scottish organiser, one Alastair McConnachie, wrote letters to The Scotsman and the Glasgow Herald, one of these questioning the extent of the 'Holocaust' and the other daring to attack the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Exactly what the letters said is not known, but since there are a lot of questions concerning the 'Holocaust' which quite legitimately might be asked, and considering also that the Board of Deputies is far from being above criticism (we remember its attempts in 1998 to get a BNP rally stopped by pressuring the owners of premises), writing letters on such subjects surely amounts to no more than a normal exercise of free speech.

But apparently such things just are 'not done' in UKIP, where anything that might raise the ire of the Jewish Community is strictly 'out of bounds'. After a complaint from one of the party's Jewish members, Mr. McConnachie was expelled from the party for five years.

But things didn't end there. After further rowing, the heretic was reinstated. This was just too much for the Jewish member, Mr. Mark Lester. Mr. Lester stormed out of UKIP, saying:

A very perceptive fox

These are a few extracts from D.W. Nash's The Fox's Prophecy, written in 1870:-

"For not upon these hills alone, the doom of sport shall fall, o'er the broad face of England creeps, the shadow on the wall.

"Time-honoured creeds and ancient faith, the Altar and the Crown, Lordship's hereditary right, before that tide go down.

"Base churls shall mock the mighty names, writ on the roll of time; religion shall be held a jest, and loyalty a crime.

"No word of prayer, no hymn of praise, sound in the village school; the people's education Utilitarians rule.

"The homes where love and peace should dwell fierce politics shall vex; and unsexed woman strive to prove herself the coarser sex.

"The statesmen that should rule the realm coarse demagogues displace; the glory of a thousand years shall end in foul disgrace.

"Trade shall be held the only good and gain the sole device; the statesman's maxim shall be peace, and peace at any price.

"Her army and her navy Britain shall cast aside; soldiers and ships are costly things, defence an empty pride.

"The footsteps of the invader then England's shore shall know, while home-bred traitors give the hand to England's every foe.

"Disarmed before the foreigner, the knee shall humbly bend, and yield the treasures that she lacked the wisdom to defend."

"I can't stay in a party which would have a man who espouses such views." He added in a letter to the party secretary: "I wish I could say that I wish you and the party success in the future - I don't."

The secretary, Mr. Michael Harvey, explained the party's point of view by saying: "The allegation that Mr. McConnachie had brought the party into disrepute was upheld. But it was later considered that his punishment was too harsh."

But not too harsh, apparently, for Mr. Lester. It rather looks as if this gentleman was determined to get his pound of flesh and was outraged when it was denied to him!

From where I stand, I cannot see why Mr. McConnachie's willingness to raise two perfectly legitimate subjects should have brought his party into disrepute at all. There is no evidence that his letters to the two papers were abusive or insulting to Jews. Apparently, one thing that he did say in reference to the Board of Deputies was that it was "seeking to establish a monopoly in the marketplace of ideas." Well, our experience with its efforts to stop our meeting lends a certain amount of credence to that suggestion.

Mr. Harvey also said in his statement on Mr. McConnachie that "his views do not amount to racism" (thank heavens for that!)... "but publishing these things was politically damaging."

Ah, there's where the UKIP secretary has a point! Where certain subjects are concerned, to venture into the realms of truth can indeed be politically damaging - in the present climate at least. It is all just a question of how important the truth really is. The problem is that political groups who opt to shun the truth today in the interests of expediency are liable to have it catch up with them tomorrow!

RACE WAR IN OLDHAM: REPORT SOON

OLDHAM in Lancashire, the scene of an ongoing racial war between Asians and Whites upon which we focused in December 1999, is becoming more of a racial powder-keg than ever. This was acknowledged in a devastating report in The Mail On Sunday on February 11th. The MoS - hardly a 'racist' paper - stated that of the 572 racist crimes recorded in the town last year 355 (two-thirds) were committed against white males. Of these, young Asians were the culprits in the vast majority of cases.

The crimes showed an increase on those for 1999 - the year described in our previous report - of no less than 100 per cent!

Local chief of police Chief Superintendent Eric Hewitt has admitted the increase and has even gone so far as to acknowledge the young Asians as being mainly responsible.

In large areas of the town white people, young and old, live in constant terror.

An up-to-date report from our local correspondent will appear soon.

Only half the story

Chlamydia Trachomatis has obviously come a long way over the past few decades. It fails to get a mention in my 1964 dictionary but is now the most common sexually transmitted disease in Britain. Some 300,000 women are thought to be affected. The number of diagnosed infections has risen by 76 per cent since 1995, and no less than 33,000 new cases were reported in 1999. The disease is linked to infertility, ectopic pregnancies, pelvic inflammatory problems and cervical cancer.

Clearly, anything affecting the health and well-being of our folk should be reported and discussed. But what we in this column would like to know is: Why is it here, and where did it come from? This is important because strange things happen on the medical scene and, believe it or not, the truth is frequently doctored (not a deliberate pun) or even withheld. Not so very long ago we were told that tuberculosis had been licked, and then it leaked out that it was virulent again – especially in overcrowded urban areas. On this occasion even the most accomplished media acrobats were unable to disguise the fact that the disease had been imported. Can any of our medically knowledgeable readers keep us posted as to what is going on?

Rotten to the core

It was alleged, though scarcely proved, that former Tory MP Neil Hamilton had accepted bribes from an Egyptian shopkeeper. This little spot of bother put an end to Mr. Hamilton's political career, and his efforts to clear his name have left him financially ruined.

Contrast this with the case of one Edward Heath, a former Tory Prime Minister. In 1970 this Heath assured both parliament and people that the European Economic Community (as it was called then) was, and would never be more than, a common market in which British farmers and manufacturers would flourish. As an example, it was pointed out that British Leyland would have unrestricted access to this vast trading area and thus become a leading player in the European motor industry (pause here to laugh or cry as you will!).

In fact, recently released papers have shown that parliament and people were wilfully

THE WAY WE LIVE NOW

Some observations on contemporary society

deceived. In the ensuing referendum voters were already unwittingly committing the UK to becoming part of a hideous, sprawling Euro super-state, and Heath was very well aware of this. This was deliberate fraud on a grand scale. And, incredibly, part of the price for our being allowed (sic) into the EEC was the surrender of our centuries-old exclusive rights to fish in our own British waters – which were, to quote the word actually used by Ministers at the time, “expendable.” However, since it has now been revealed that this act of treason was illegal even under the then obtaining Community Law, there appears to be no reason why a future patriotic government should not immediately reclaim our ancient rights by whatever means are necessary at the time.

Now it is not the function of this column to fight Mr. Hamilton's battles for him – although it is doubted whether his alleged transgression had the slightest effect on the national well-being. But is it not a shocking indictment of our times that, unlike him, Heath was never hounded out of politics nor charged with any crimes?

You pays your money...

It occurred to us that, had the swashbuckling, pensionpinching pirate Cap'n Bob Maxwell not fallen (or been pushed?) overboard from his yacht in 1991, he would almost certainly have been made a New Labour peer by now!

The media go mad

Of what possible interest can it be to the majority of our folk whether two half-caste babies are the property of a foolish couple in North Wales or of people in California. Yet this tedious story has been publicised ad nauseam. And, strange as it may seem, the would-be foster father is reported as being a member of some tin-pot political party opposed to immigration! How inconsistent can you get? As we see it, the moral behind all this is: “Take care when you buy something on the Internet.”

Justice must be done

Our researches into the trial of the late Charles Stuart, a.k.a. King Charles the First of England (decapitated 1649), indicate that much of the evidence leading to his execution was unreliable, that the prosecution's case was fundamentally flawed and that the verdict was, to put it bluntly, unsafe. However, since King Charles was neither Republican Irish, homosexual nor from an ethnic minority, it is likely that getting Jack Straw to recommend a posthumous pardon may prove to be an uphill task.

Never-never Land

Fraud and default on credit cards cost billions every year. Why then are we persistently plagued with inducements to sign up for this or that new wonder card with all its alleged ancillary ‘benefits’? The answer is, of course, that it is all to do with maximising turnover – the predicted/expected bad debt ratio having been already built into the equation that sets the rate of interest charged. Thus, although we recognise that there will be a percentage of genuine folk who have fallen on hard times, the honest, prudent borrower is, for the most part, funding the depredations of the cheat and the fraudster. It is rather like mugging, but without the violence and, as such, is immoral and desperately in need of proper regulation.

Heads into the trough, chaps!

Thanks to the Royal Navy, your columnist learned several useful new words and expressions at an early age. One of these was: “Taking the p.s.s out of someone.” Pungent enough, no doubt, but not so easy to describe, so allow me to give an example. Seven members of the Commons Foreign Affairs Committee travelling by Eurostar ran up a bill of £5,600 for an overnight trip. That's £800 each, but peanuts compared with a six-day trip to Cuba as part of an enquiry into the public health system in that country, when the budget for nine of 'em was £47,085 – of our money. That's more than £5,000 each. No doubt they'll be telling us that was necessary public expenditure!

PRESS THE BUTTON!

The Press, says MICHAEL WALSH, can be used for our purposes. Here he argues for a positive and thoughtful approach to this powerful medium

YOU DON'T get anywhere in life unless you press buttons, and the media are just another button for you to press. Generally speaking, the media are hostile to white racial nationalism. But does this mean that the media can never be used to our advantage?

In fact, the media can be our most powerful tool if we look at it in a positive sense. Radical organisations of all kinds attack the media but constantly use them to gather news and repackage it for their own followers.

With the exception of the BBC and the Daily Mirror, most of the media can be used free of charge to bring us news on which we can put our own slant. Every day they pay news agencies and journalists a fortune for something we get for free. Don't knock them; use them!

They know not what they do

First, don't assume that all journalists are flint-hearted, unscrupulous bastards – just because most of them are. Be Christian about it – many of them simply aren't aware of their shortcomings. You certainly won't turn them into friends by telling them home truths about such things, even if it makes you feel better. Try the diplomatic approach first.

If you are writing to the press and want to get a point over, don't politicise your letter – otherwise it will categorise you and make them hostile before they even read what you have written.

It is a mistake to assume that journalists get more letters than they can read. Unless it is hostile or offensive to them or is anonymous, journalists always read their mail. Providing what you say is politely put, they will usually write a nice letter back, even if it is critical of what you say.

How's this for an example of what you might be able to put in a letter to a newspaper:-

"Dear Sir/Madam,

I found your article quite enlightening but, with respect, you must be aware by now that a substantial and informed body of opinion questions the unproven figure of six million Jews killed under Hitler, and qualified research questions whether the 'Holocaust' ever took place at all – other than in the minds of the propagandists working for the victors in the war."

Or:-

"Dear Sir/Madam,

Excuse me, but you mentioned the death of Anne Frank nearly sixty years ago. Are you the same journalist who turned a blind eye when Jewish snipers were picking off Arab stone-throwers, some of them little more than children?"

I am not suggesting that such a letter will turn the journalist into a 'holocaust-denier' or someone hostile to Israel's terrorism, but it will make him aware that there are doubts on such subjects, and that they are being increasingly aired. It might well begin to open a previously closed mind, and even if the journalist is a dyed-in-the-wool holocauster or Zionist bootlicker it will unsettle him. It's a step in the right direction. It's a positive approach rather than a negative one. If you don't draw his attention to controversy and dissent, he can't possibly know that an opposing opinion exists.

Which newspaper?

Journalists – whether they work for national, regional or local newspapers – are human. Remember that there was a time when you believed in the lies of the media too – on the subject of the 'Holocaust', for example. As these journalists are in that same mind-warp as you once were, think yourself lucky to be enlightened, and lead them out of the mind-warped gently and politely.

Who knows? The softly-softly approach you employ now could have consequences some time in the future, when the paper you are writing to prints an article throwing some light (as far as it dares) on the so-called 'Holocaust'. Or, if not that, it might lead to the paper refusing to publish some very blatant piece of holo-hoax propaganda sent in to the editor.

The better-educated the journalist is, the more likely he is to abandon or soften his views – or at least dilute the opposition's propaganda press releases or 'information'. You might have planted the seed!

It is worth bearing in mind too that journalists, like everyone else, have to watch their backs. If they step too far out of the zone of political correctness their jobs could be in danger. Be understanding – unless you too would risk your own job for an outspoken public statement, made in defence of a principle.

Finally, even if a journalist is sympathetic towards you and what you are saying, don't expect him to trust you enough to advertise that fact in a personal letter of reply. As he would see it, such a letter could be dynamite!

National or local?

You should separate national newspapers from regional and local ones: they are not the same. National papers are interested only in really big stories, letters and contributions that are likely to interest a wide range of readers, wherever they live. For instance, your opposition to refugees being allocated to Leicester will interest only readers in Leicester, so write to the Leicester Mercury but do not waste time doing so to the Daily Mail or Daily Telegraph. Remember also that a paper like the Daily Mail will typically receive two thousand readers' letters and e-mails in a single day but will have space to publish only about twenty of them.

It's all a bit of a lottery, but providing you know what is likely to appeal to the selection panel at which you are aiming you can improve your chances of publication. I have had at least six letters published in the Daily Mail out of about twelve sent, so as long as you know the tricks of the trade you can get results. Each time you do you have about six million readers. You don't get that kind of audience on Hyde Park Corner!

Local newspapers are not as political as the nationals, and they are more inclined to publish letters or comment on controversial subjects – especially those with a local slant. They operate in a much more competitive marketplace, so they actually relish controversy. Obviously, they receive far fewer letters from readers, and they thrive on 'sparklers' – letters that stir up a bit of lively debate.

A regional newspaper will receive about eighty letters a day and a local newspaper far fewer. But where else could you get an audience of, say, twenty thousand?

Here's a specimen:

"Dear Sir/Madam,

I think I speak for most local people when I say that I object strongly to local taxpayers' money being spent on housing economic refugees. The local authority has no mandate to do this, and I will wait with interest to see if its generosity with our money is mentioned in its election leaflets in months' time. Is there any chance of local so-called 'democratic' politicians asking our opinions first?"

How to ensure a letter is published

The trick to getting letters published is to follow the five golden rules of journalism. Who? What? Where? Why? and When? You will see this formula followed in everything you read in any newspaper, national or local.

Don't allow your letter to ramble, and don't miss essential points. Just keep to the issue, and after you have written the letter don't post it until you have cut its length by at least 20 per cent. Have a look at the letters that are published in papers and learn from them. And get a friend to check your letter out before 20,000 readers do!

Short, polite but concerned letters on local issues likely to interest local readers will usually be published.

Don't worry about being identified and threatened. Newspapers are unlikely to publish letters inflammatory enough to provoke a strong reaction.

Keep your letters polite and free of abuse, and the world will respond likewise. Besides, few newspapers publish sufficient detail for a letter-correspondent to be identified unless that person is already a publicly known figure – in which case it hardly matters.

Newspapers never publish anonymous letters nor those of doubtful authenticity. This includes letters with box numbers.

Press releases

A press release is a public statement or announcement such as you might pay a town crier to announce, but these days we use newspapers. The more professionally presented the release is, the better its chance of being printed. It is, after all, your organisation's shop window. If you want the organisation to have a scruffy, illiterate image – fine: send a scruffy, illiterate press release!

These days, with word-processors, there is no excuse for unprofessional-looking letterheads or press releases. Here's an example:-

RIGHTS FOR WHITES

Box 1234, Manchester M... ..

Local opposition to economic refugees

More information

If you need a directory of newspapers, you will find a copy of Willings Press Guide and others like it in the reference section of your local library.

Better still, why not pick up a copy of the Writers' and Artists' Year Book at your local bookshop? It costs about £10, is published by A & C Black (London), and all booksellers are familiar with it. Just ask for it by name. It is a fascinating encyclopaedic volume listing hundreds of British (and foreign) newspapers and magazines. These include addresses of TV and radio companies.

Good luck!

THOUGHT FOR THE MONTH

The two Britains which faced each other in April 1997 were utterly alien to one another and unfairly matched. One was old and dying, treasuring ideas and values which stretched back into a misty past. One was new and hardly born, clinging just as fiercely to its own values of of classlessness, anti-racism, sexual inclusiveness and licence, contempt for the nation-state, dislike of deference, scorn for restraint and incomprehension for the web of traditions and prejudices which were revered by the other side. Culturally, Labour had been in power for years.

PETER HITCHENS
The Abolition of Britain

SIR: One vital question concerning the death of Anna Climbie does not seem to have been raised, so far as I am aware. Why were Anna and her putative great aunt, Marie Thérèse Kouao, allowed into this country in the first place? As natives of the Ivory Coast, a former French colony, they had no right of abode here whatsoever. It seems that the French authorities, on realising that Mrs. Kouao was defrauding their social security services, overcame the problem by allowing her to 'escape' with Anna to Britain. We will now have to pay for the upkeep in prison of this murderous woman and her lover for many years to come.

Two other alarming incidents that have recently occurred make me wonder whether any immigration controls are operating here at all. Firstly, it has been revealed that several HIV-positive African nurses have been allowed into the country to work for the NHS; and secondly, it now seems that foreign babies can be purchased via the Internet and then brought here without any attempt by the Immigration Service to stop them.

It is high time that a blanket ban on the immigration of all people of non-British ancestry were imposed once and for all.
RONALD RICKCORD
Newport Pagnell, Bucks.

SIR: The article about meeting Blair at Oxford (January issue) really brought back some good memories. I was there too and remember a lot of what was described. Yes, the adrenalin was really flowing that night – amongst other things! One thing that I do remember was being in close proximity to the editor. In the rush into the hall he got so carried away that he went right past the entrance, which was off to our left. I managed to batter my way in, hoping he was following, but he did emerge a short time later at the entrance, a bit ruffled but full of fire for the meeting. A great time was had by all – except Blair's friends!
RICHARD PARTRIDGE
South Ruislip, Middlesex

SIR: The article by Mr. Tyndall about splits in nationalist parties (January issue) was excellent, and should be read by nationalists all over the world. For example, here in Finland no kind of meaningful nationalist party has arisen because of continuous splits – even now when the flow of asylum-seekers is changing the whole face of the country.

One of the worst examples of divisive-ness happened in South Africa in the days leading to the white downfall. When the National Party abolished the policy of separate development, the Afrikaners and other Whites did not unite forces to oppose this. Also, even among Afrikaners there were divisions, with the two main opposition parties on the right, The Herstigte Nasionale Party and the Conservative Party, remaining separate and even contesting seats against each other. Both F.W. De Klerk and Nelson Mandela have said that white unity, had it existed, would have been the one barrier to black majority rule.

LASSE LEHTINEN
Kokkola, Finland

SIR: I am in full agreement with your New Year's message. Internecine struggle has been the bane of our movement since its inception. Our strength is sapped. Those with the longer vision will, quite rightly, attempt to persuade the deviants to return to the only fold that makes sense, and more time will be lost.

We the British, and Europeans in general, are facing dangers that we have never before encountered. Not only is the enemy at the gates but he is also firmly entrenched at the pinnacles of power within.

Are those who think they know a better way than the BNP really all just dimwits? I ask myself if our enemies have not succeeded in penetrating our ranks in order to sow the seeds of dissension and division.
T.D. FOSTER
Edgware, Middlesex

SIR: In response to Mr. R. Ferrari's observations on my aviation article, I would respectfully point out the following:-

Britain did indeed suffer serious problems in World War I due to lack of suitable aero-engines – indeed due to lack of a suitable aero-engine industry. This was not due to a lack of technical ability but was a direct result of the policies of free trade pursued in the decades before the war (see Correlli Barnett's The Collapse of British Power).

As regards the Gloster Meteor, I am afraid Mr. Ferrari is misinformed. This all-British jet aircraft did see combat service in World War II. The first Meteor squadron was declared operational at RAF Manston, Kent, on 26th July 1944. Just over a week later, Flying Officer 'Dixie' Dean, in one of them, downed a V1 by tipping it over with his wing. A few minutes later, his wingman, Flying Officer Rogers, got another V1 with his guns.

If British politicians would back British genius instead of sabotaging it, we could go to the stars.
PAUL FLAVELLE
Grimsby, Lincs.

SIR: How my heart bled for the so-called 'asylum-seekers' featured in Channel Four's Bloody Foreigners recently!

Having risked the journey through several European countries to reach the promised Land, they find employment illegally with apparent ease, then complain about not being paid enough!

Indigenous Britons paid the minimum wage of £3.70 an hour – which is the going rate here for hard graft often including working shifts – have also to pay income tax and national insurance contributions, supposedly for our sick, children and elderly. We cannot get the social security payments which many of these recent arrivals are getting under false pretences, together with all the extras that go with them: free medical treatment and help with housing costs and council tax. This makes the newcomers, in effect, much better off than many of our own people!

When are we going to wake up to the fact that the 'bloody foreigners' (Channel Four's words, not mine) are stealing not only our jobs and wages but also our future?
P. ELVIDGE (Mrs.)
Misterton, Doncaster, Yorks.

SIR: According to Radio Lancashire, organ-donor cards are to be put into wage packets. Apparently, the never-adequate supply has been dwindling even further. Perhaps it has not occurred to the medical profession that more and more people are coming to regard organ transplants as morally indefensible, and are therefore reluctant to lend themselves to this high-tech butchery.

Of course, the medical profession promotes transplants because these make nice little earners, paid for by the long-suffering taxpayer, but some of the nastier and lesser-known facts about transplants are these: organs must come from living donors, who are of course killed when the organs are removed; organs taken from the dead are useless for transplanting.

Hardly any transplants are wholly successful because of the near-impossibility of matching the tissue types of patients and donors. Those readers who hold religious convictions might argue that such obstacles as tissue-rejection have been divinely ordained to prevent man playing God.
N.G. CHARNLEY
Blackpool, Lancs.

SIR: How's this for a laugh? In a recent internet survey of more than 1,650 students aged between 19 and 25, a clear majority said that they found opposition leader William Hague had more sex-appeal than Premier Tony Blair! Only 39 per cent said they would prefer the Prime Minister, while 61 per cent voted for Hague.

But here's the best bit – when it came to the opinions of 'gay' students there was a dramatic reversal. No less than 80 per cent of those polled said they would prefer to sleep with Blair than with Hague. Queer activist Peter Tatchell said: "Tony has the physical attributes most men go for: great smile, full lips, big hands and decent head of hair."

Further comment is superfluous!
D.W. DRAKE

SIR: The mass media describe the new Israeli Prime Minister as a 'far-right' leader. Should we now expect a chorus of condemnation from all European countries ... except perhaps Austria?

Excellent Bletchley meeting

THE BEDS/BUCKS unit of the British National Party held its very first meeting on the 25th January. The venue was in Bletchley, just outside Milton Keynes. About 40-45 people were in attendance – good considering that there has not been a BNP unit in Milton Keynes since the 1980s and that most of the people present were local folk.

The main speakers were BNP Chairman

Nick Griffin and Group Development Officer Tony Lecomber. Also speaking was the Beds/Bucks organiser John McSweeney.

For many present, the meeting was the first ever BNP meeting that they had attended, and the atmosphere was electric and a fantastic morale-boost to these newcomers, who previously had felt cut off and isolated.

The collection raised reflected the mood of the meeting. Over £190 was donated, and literature sales brought in a further £95.00.

Later on after the meeting there were drinks in a local pub, where everyone had the chance to get to know each other better and contacts were established with a view to further activities. Everyone who wants to be active in the area can now do so, knowing whom to ring, and so on.

All in all, the meeting represented a big stride forward for the new group.

At the meeting it was decided that Spearhead editor John Tyndall would be invited to be guest speaker at a local meeting in the near future. Anyone interested in attending can obtain details from organiser John McSweeney at: Beds/Bucks Group BNP, PO Box 5233, Milton Keynes MK3 6ZL.

SPRING RALLY – NORTH Saturday, 3rd March 2001

Due to popular demand, the British National party is holding two big Spring meetings this year. One, in the south of Britain on the 24th February, will have taken place by the time this issue reaches the reader. Top party speakers will include Administration Officer Chris Green, Group Development Director Tony Lecomber, Publicity Director Paul Golding, Deputy Chairman Scott McLean and National Chairman Nick Griffin.

Added to these will be a wide range of regional and local organisers. A new display team will make this meeting the most mainstream and professional-looking the BNP has ever held.

The Eleventh Hour

The Eleventh Hour has been described as the 'Bible' of the British National Party. First published in 1988, the latest (1998) edition has been updated to take in the many new developments on the political scene occurring since. Written by the founder of the British National Party John Tyndall, the book gives comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain. It delves into the ideologies of liberalism, conservatism and the left, and also examines that of British Nationalism and its background. It contains extensive analyses of the British economy and political system. It looks at issues connected with freedom and order, the mass media, the environment, race and immigration, Northern Ireland, the Commonwealth, foreign policy and defence. It also gives a detailed outline of the development of the BNP and its predecessor organisations in Britain.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages. It is partly autobiographical, giving an account of the author's origins, early political awakening and subsequent life's work.

BEST DEWSBURY MEETING FOR YEARS

IN SPITE of the blizzard-like conditions on Sunday, the 4th February, more than 60 people attended a meeting of the re-formed Dewsbury branch of the British National Party to hear talks by Dr. Phill Edwards (National Press Officer) and Party Chairman Nick Griffin.

The new branch organiser Nick Cass opened the meeting and introduced the guests, while thanking everyone for making the effort to attend in such extreme weather. He then spoke briefly about the party in Dewsbury and the work in which he and other activists were engaged. Mr. Cass said that the BNP's great strength is that it deals in facts and in truth – unlike its opponents, whose currency is evasion and double-talk.

Dr. Phill Edwards spoke about political correctness and how it serves to oppress the British people. He said that the real 'racists' were the multi-culturalists, whose long-term aim is the merging and destruction of all the races of mankind. Dr. Edwards emphasised that the BNP values racial differences, and unlike the political parties of the establishment it has policies which really will help preserve the "rich tapestry of mankind."

Party Chairman Nick Griffin expressed his concern at the growth of racial attacks committed against white people.

MAIN SPEAKER
Nick Griffin

He said that government statistics clearly show that members of the ethnic minorities are responsible for the greater proportion of race-hate crimes. Yet in spite of this the politicians and establishment media act as though the reverse were the case!

Mr. Griffin said that the blame for inter-racial strife in this country lay with the politicians, the establishment media and their multi-racial experiment, not with the ethnic minorities. He said that an increasing number of people are unhappy with the mess that the politicians have made of the country, and that they are looking for an alternative. To applause, he emphasised that the British National Party is that alternative.

Afterwards, everyone enjoyed an excellent buffet, and the guests mingled with the audience. Even though the snow continued to fall, no-one was in any rush to leave. The meeting was a resounding success, and a collection for the branch election fund raised over £350 – one member of the audience donating £100!

Report by Nick Cass

BNP leadership election

As readers will have seen on page four of this issue, Spearhead editor John Tyndall will be challenging Nick Griffin in an election for the BNP leadership later this year.

Also mentioned on page four is the importance of all those supporting Mr. Tyndall ensuring that they are eligible to vote by bringing their membership subscriptions up to date by paying for 2001. But this is not all.

Soon after attaining the party leadership in 1999, Mr. Griffin introduced two new clauses into the party's Constitution. One was a requirement that a leadership candidate have a record of not less than five years' continuous party membership – a condition that would have disqualified Mr. Griffin when he stood in 1999.

Another was that a challenger in a leadership election must either be a current party office-holder or produce 100 signatures of paid-up party members in support of his nomination – again neither of which were applicable when Mr. Griffin stood.

Mr. Tyndall will be seeking help from his supporters in ensuring that these signatures are obtained well in advance of the time for nomination in June. He would be pleased to hear from anyone who is willing to provide this help. Note our new address (page 19).

Young

All BNP members from the age of 16 - 24 need to join the Young BNP. Send a photocopy or hardcopy (it will be returned) of your

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, c/o PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be much appreciated. Thanks.

... AND STILL THEY KEEP COMING!

This boat, packed with yet more hordes of 'asylum-seekers', ran aground off the French coast last month with the occupants begging to be let ashore. As to where 'ashore' is, one of them made it perfectly clear where they intended to be heading. "We were charged $2,000 for adults and $1,500 for children to get to Britain," he claimed.
